Story of the Kirtland Bank

Among the historic buildings of Northern Ohio of especial interest to numismatists is the Morman Temple at Kirtland. This building was begun in 1833, each Morman giving one seventh of his time gratis to the construction of the building. It was completed and dedicated in 1836, six years after Joseph Smith, Morman leader and prophet, had led fifty Morman families from New York state to Ohio.

State Refuses Charter

In 1836 an attempt was made to establish a bank but the state refused to grant a charter, supposedly because of religious prejudice. The formation of this bank is closely connected with the history of the Morman sect. The building formerly stood to the left and on a line with the Temple and the knobbed safe that held the currency of the banking society is now the property of the Western Reserve Historical Society of Cleveland. In January 1837, the Kirtland Safety Society was organized with 175 stockholders. The articles of agreement, however, gave the name as the Kirtland Safety Society Anti-Banking Company and it was under this name that the association transacted business. Notes were issued in denominations from one to one hundred dollars, plates for the printing having been secured from Philadelphia at considerable expense before the refusal of the state to grant a charter.

Bills Are Redeemed

When the unchartered institution failed in August 1837, eight months after its organization, the members found themselves unable to redeem its pledges. Later, however, without being forced by legal process, they redeemed practically all the outstanding circulation. Afterward, in the Great Salt Lake community, to which Brigham Young had led the flock following the murder of Joseph Smith in Illinois, it is said that the notes were restored to their full face value. This was in the Days of '49. The Church had gold dust in its coffers that had been brought back by members who had been active in the California gold fields, and when the need arose for a circulating medium, the notes circulated freely and were exchanged for gold at their full value.

Information for this story was obtained from "Kirtland Bank Bills" by Waldo C. Moore, in the "Numismatist" May, 1914 and from "Kirtland Temple," a booklet issued by the Church of the Latter Day Saints, Kirtland, Ohio.

Catalog of Coins and Paper Money
